Subject: [EXTERNAL] Fw: Senator Hawley Slams Publishing Company From Dropping Book Deal Exposing Big Tech

I was thrown out of a political science class at SFSU a year ago because I objected to the professor's characterization of conservatives as racist, homophobic and anti women. There were other negative images on his list but I can't remember all of them. When I asked him to present a more honest description of what conservatives believe he shut me down and told me I was no longer welcome to attend his class and further that I was banned from ever again crossing the threshold of his classroom. That conservatives are evil is what is being taught in many (possibly most) college classes in America. I am not on Facebook or Twitter but I am an avid reader of books so the withdrawal from the contract for the publication of this book has hit me hard. I wonder if this is legal? Further I wonder whether the threat of prosecution for the telephone conversation Trump had with the governor of Georgia is legal. When someone secretly tapes a telephone conversation for the purpose of harming the unknowing person on the other end of the line it is considered a tortious felony. The person who should be prosecuted is the governor who committed this crime. Does anyone think about the legal implications of this blatant bias against conservatives?
